THE DUTCH INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

I cannot give you my name, date of birth or place of birth.

I'm just here to explain what happened the day my men went to visit [REDACTED]. Of course. We all know there is shady stuff going on, on Royal Dutch Shell's side. But at least it's just one side. And anyway we police private citizens, not companies. The whole reason we approached that girl from the Dutch climate movement, is that we see there are a whole myriad of sides, considering a whole range of radical options against fossil fuel infrastructure these days. And as our society fully depends on fossil fuels, we cannot let radical groups unhinge access points or interfere with the infrastructure that delivers demand. We just figured we could play the lefties against the extreme right for information on the workings of both groups.

I don't know why she wasn't interested in hearing information from the other side and why our visit received the attention it did. Anyway, I'll give this deposition so that it's clear we were just working on, not necessarily stopping, but being in the know of what these groups have planned for the stability of our country.

Oh you also want to know about that? Well I am not a member of the FIOD department, and you must understand that investigating fiscal cases is very different to keeping a check on extremist groups in the Netherlands. But yes I do know of it. The FIOD and the Nigerian EFCC were in Nigeria in 2017 to investigate a corruption affair with regards to the Nigerian oilfield OPL245, involving the Dutch and Italian authorities. Shell and the Italian oil company Eni allegedly paid 1 billion dollars in 'palm grease' to local civil servants and political individuals to gain the rights to OPL245. Obviously the investigation by FIOD was prepared in all secrecy. FIOD visited the Dutch Ambassador [REDACTED] before commencing the an investigation. He is responsible for all the Dutch goings on in Nigeria after all, and was expected to help organise this highly confidential visit. What appears is that following this visit the Dutch Ambassador tipped Shell off that they were being investigated. He must have his reasons, but there was no mistaking that he was absolutely forbidden from doing so according to his position.
